Do Animals Reason?

Do Animals Reason?

One thing, by way of suggestion, should be mentioned here. In forming a judgment of animal reasoning it is well to remember that we have but one paychology. The general idea seems to be that we should seek a special paychology, distinct from our own, erroneous or misleading. So far as we can see, the laws of mind are as constant as the laws of physics and chemistry, which apply equally well to the oil well and to the light from Arctirus and the Fleiades. We know a little a very little, of our own psychology, and that is the only measure we possess to lay upon the life of any creature. All thought except my own is strange to me; I am never sure of it, but can only infer and then estimate it from the actions of the animal beam man or a bear. I am under the same necessity to watch his actions, and than infer his mental process from what goes on In my own head under similar circumstances. To one who judges animals in this rational way there is no doubt of their reasoning. The only problem lies in the quality and the amount of that reason, and in the origin and cause of that whole process of history which stretches like a wide sea between us and the animal kingdom—W. J. Long, in Harper 5.
